Casey's Comments

By Casey McCormick

 These days everything seems to be about "change."
 It's as if all that has happened in America to this point is somehow flawed and should be replaced. Well, I know of one thing that needs to remain exactly as it is.
 Last week I attended a funeral for one of the few who remain of a rare breed: a World War II vet.
 I didn't know Henry Schirmer before the service, but afterwards I felt a certain understanding of him and his time here.
 Henry had a full life doing many of the simple things that make an ordinary man so extraordinary. He was a father, husband, farmer, neighbor and for many years taught Sunday school.
 But what struck me was how this quiet, unassuming citizen had given his all when his country needed his help. He was under General George S. Patton, in the 3rd Army, for four campaigns that liberated Europe from the Nazi grip.

 Beyond that, Henry received the Bronze Star for trying to save another soldier's life. The only higher honor for a military member is the Congressional Medal of Honor.
 So, as this humble farmer was laid to rest, a honor guard from Ft. Riley fired a 21-gun-salute, played taps and presented his daughter with the neatly, folded American flag that had draped his casket.
 Our country is moving forward into uncharted waters, but the sacrifices of the brave men and women who have gotten us to this embarkation point should not be forgotten. That kind of service to country is something that can't be improved upon and requires no change.

Letters from Linda

By Linda Schneider
dublins@hotmail.com
 What if you could see into the future? I am not talking about horoscopes or fortunetellers; I mean what if looking into one's own future was a skill. I wonder what our choices would be?
 Something I had to learn in prison was how to make good choices and the first thing I learned was choices consisted of two or more options. Now that may seem like a no-brainer to you, but for me it was revolutionary since all previous choices I based on my addictions.
 What happened as I learned to change the way I was making choices was, I started having feelings of being emotionally uncomfortable. I would have thoughts like, "Is what I am doing right?" or one day I would say "yes" only to say "no" later. I truly thought I was going out of my mind! Guess what! It was normal. What was happening to me was emotional dissonance and I was learning to become a person responsible for my choices. Dissonance means discord or different, some folks experience physical dissonance learning how to drive.

 Now that I have laid the groundwork, last week was the annual Pro-Life March in Washington, D.C.; this year's hope was to encourage President Obama to change his stance of pro-choice on the issue of abortion. There's that word "choice."
 I am not here to place judgments on anyone or their choices — God only knows that would make me a hypocrite. I want to share something important I have learned about making choices. In The Purpose Driven Life, author Rick Warren hits right on the mark as he writes to the reader in the first chapter, first sentence; "It's not about you." If that causes you to be offended, it is emotional dissonance; because you believe it IS about you.
 Finally, I would like to leave you with something else I have learned, there is always hindsight looking back, but choices made cannot be changed; however, contained within every new choice are the promises of a hope, a future, a destiny and much more. "Choose wisely, grasshopper."

CheyenneCoDevelopments

By Chuck Kribs

What about Cheyenne County? Our economy in this county seems to be falling apart more every day.

We here in Cheyenne County are fortunate, in that we don't have massive plant closings, high unemployment, unbearable welfare costs. BUT we will see, are seeing, a trickle-down effect from the downturn.

We ask: What about Cheyenne County? What can we do, all of us, to maintain what we have and even grow in this downturn?

Diane and I, Cheyenne County Development Corporation, will be hosting a county-wide meeting in the near future, and asking you, "What about Cheyenne County?"

We want you to give that some thought, and bring to that meeting your ideas, your energy, to answer that question. "What about Cheyenne County?"

We have had a number of questions regarding "wind farms." People are asking what the downside is of those big towers. We have done some research, and will have available at the office, a paper addressing the "Pros and Cons" of wind energy. Stop in if you are interested in picking one up. Or, just stop in....
