Buyer knows what makes a good auction

If recent auctions are any indication. Norton is well on the way to maintaining a reputation as a hot town for auction action. Local auctioneers as well as some from around the area are booking for the coming spring season, so if you're planning a sale, don't dilly dally around getting it scheduled. A good auction requires certain key elements. First you must have a seller with some worthwhile merchandise and an auction firm that can run a tight ship. Location, a good date and sufficient advertising are essential to ensure a good crop of buyers. But everyone knows the major draw is the food stand full of pie! And here's a little tip from an old auction hand — the quality of the pie and noodles is directly proportional to the age of the ladies running the food stand. Those older gals never met Mrs. Smith or Sara Lee.

Some unusual offerings have drawn good crowds to town in the last few weeks. Somebody somewhere is probably getting a canopied heart-shaped bed for Valentine's Day. Others may be receiving a set of modern pink Fiesta dinnerware that sold at a terrific bargain, or a sparkling piece of lead crystal or cut glass that will brighten a heart. An arrangement of polar bear pictures went for a song and so did new and pretty pink flowered enamel cookware. A multi color bell collection brought more than original prices while an extensive Italian porcelain Capodimonte grouping sold very reasonably. Several intricate Capodimonte baskets and decorated bowls, overflowing with fragile flowers, were crafted to look so real you bent to sniff the roses. What really drew the bidders a couple of weeks back, however, was an astounding array of glowing cranberry glass.

Cranberry glass has never lost popularity since its first appearance shortly after the Civil War. The color is so distinctive and breathtaking that it has been manufactured by many companies and embellished in myriad ways. It is ticklish to figure out the vintage of a beautiful piece unless you have years of experience viewing and buying pieces. Fenton is reproducing it still today. This is one place where it may be advisable to buy what you cannot resist, regardless of age or value. While there was plenty to go around in this offering, there was spirited bidding from a number of determined buyers. Hopefully everyone went home happy. My personal favorite was a set of four small cranberry tumblers in a charming gilt carrier. Unfortunately, my bid did not prevail.

Collector Chat Liza Deines

It's always amusing to go people-watching at an auction. Matter of fact, a lot of people do that and only that. The spectators arrive early, take the best seats, watch all day, and never bid once. Dealers arrive early, too, but only estimate bids opposed to resale profit. Collectors, however, come with one or two items in mind and bid until the cows come home to get them. Two collectors bidding against each other for a coveted trifle can be vastly entertaining to those without the deep pockets to compete. Impulse bidders are those who really just came to visit and eat lunch but somehow end up with a car full of $1 boxes to haul home and hide in the garage. Young couples seeking to furnish a house with some vintage style are often seen hauling out really good buys on lightly used furniture. If your talent lies in refinishing, an auction can be a delightful hunting ground for your next project. My home is furnished with forty years of auction furniture but when I saw what quality pieces sold in Norton recently, I longed to start all over again.

The two cardinal rules for auction enthusiasts? Come hungry and hold that bidding number up high. See you at the next auction and don't forget to bring a friend and a pickup truck.

MY MAMA SAID: When it comes to auction bidding, if you can't run with the big dogs, better stay under the porch.
