The night before Christmas

It's nippy with just enough snow to crunch under the tires on the drive to church. Our sanctuary windows glow with welcoming candle light, for it is Christmas Eve. Joyous voices carry in the crisp night air as rosy-cheeked families arrive in clusters. Warm hugs and cries of delight greet out-of-town relatives and college kids home for the holidays. Organ music drifts across the candlelit snow inviting us into golden warmth.

A jubilant burst of brass from the balcony trumpets forth "Oh Come All Ye Faithful" and we all rise. Sunday School angels, tinsel wings shimmering, if slightly askew, proceed down the aisle, followed by shepherds with cardboard crooks and tea towel head-dresses, a flock of kindergarten lambs trotting along with them. Next come regal wise men in gold paper crowns burdened with gifts. Mary and Joseph kneel beside a scrap wood manger, fashioned for the annual pageant by LeRoy and David. A breathless hush falls over the crowd.

And now the age old story of the birth beneath the star unrolls before us in all its simple glory. Sweet children's voices waver through "Away in a Manger." We read the scripture from Luke, punctuating it with "The First Noel." "O Little Town of Bethlehem," "Hark the Herald Angels Sing" and "Joy to the World" and then, all too soon, it is time for "Silent Night." Tiny candles, lit one from another, spread through the darkened church as the gentle melody closes the service. Children clutching brown paper bags of candy and nuts dash around on the snowy lawn while families howdy'n shake before heading home.

Back in our warm and festive house we five gather in the living room, plug in the tree and light every candle. In the flickering light we sing "Happy Birthday Dear Jesus" over pieces of Grandma's applesauce cake. Each child opens one gift and we open Grandma's homemade candy box. Oh, the delicious decisions! Each of us chooses three pieces and revels in the unaccustomed treats, the tree lights, the candles, until bedtime rolls around. Warm wax scents the room as the candles are snuffed.

Half an hour later David sneaks softly back upstairs and he and LeRoy trudge over to the junior high school where Dan's Christmas bicycle is hidden in the depths of the boiler room. They return wearing identical conspiratorial grins, roll the bike into the garage and drape it with an old bedspread. Mysteriously several other packages appear beneath the tree. Off to bed on the night before Christmas, contented and comfortable.

Somehow that comfortable contentment seems to be missing from so many families nowadays, and I mourn its loss. Through the years the commercial aspect of the holiday season has accelerated to an alarming frenzy and the ante has risen to extremely expensive heights. The peace and joy that came from Christmas Eve at church gets lost in the shopping shuffle.

Yes, we gave gifts and they were reasonably nice gifts for the times, but we tried to keep the emphasis on the joy of giving a carefully chosen gift and off greed and grasping. Kids will be kids but they don't have to become selfish kids. Decorating the sanctuary at church, caroling at the AndBe Home and Christmas Day delivery of Meals on Wheels helped our family focus on giving of time, talents and abilities rather than purchased presents. And we never missed church on Christmas Eve.

That joy of choosing just the right gift for a family member has carried over into adult life. These days I watch with amusement when one of the kids spies and buys an ideal sibling gift in July or September, then must struggle to keep from giving it early just for the pleasure of seeing the reception they know it will get.

Speaking of the children, they would be telling me to get off my soapbox and stop preaching, so I shall, My wish for you is a Christ centered Christmas that will fill your spiritual tank rather than empty your account at the bank and leave you with a joyful heart all through the coming New Year.

Making gingerbread

Tracy Sanson and her granddaughter Skylar Sumner built a gingerbread house at Eisenhower Elementary School last Friday. Kindergartners and one member of their family decorated the houses, made out of empty milk cartons, with frosting, graham crackers and candy.
