Association holds annual meeting last Wednesday

By Karen Krien karen.k@nwkansas.com

The annual Cheyenne County Farm Bureau meeting was held Wednesday in the St. Francis high school cafeteria. Introductions were made Dan Sowers. Dave Brown, Farm Bureau agent, gave a brief talk on the benefits of Farm Bureau services. Following a dinner of steak, potatoes and gravy, the poster winners were announced.

Clayton Janicke, District Farm Family of the Year, told about the trip to Washington, D.C., which he and his family had made representing Kansas Farm Bureau.

Speaker was Rich Felts, vice president of the Kansas Farm Bureau. He talked about making choices and what "if that choice had not been made, what would have happened?" There were also the times when Farm Bureau had fought for different issues and "if" they would not have been there for the people, farmers in particular, there could have been some rules and regulations which would have been bad for the farmers. One instance mentioned was when the legislators tried to pass a child labor law which would have forbid teenagers to work on the farm, whether it was driving a tractor or using a screw driver.

Alisa Rath, county coordinator for the organization, was recognized for the work she does through the year as well as organizing the annual meeting. Casey

When we started the Steeling the Mind Conference in 1993, we believed there were subtle dangers that were beginning to threaten our Christian freedoms and values in America . . . and we wanted to armor believers with God's truth. Now, 18 years later, the danger is not subtle, but virulent, and it threatens to destroy not only our Christian freedoms, but our very

The danger is closing in on every front—political, legal and constitutional. But the answers are still the same: "Continue in the things you have learned and become convinced of . . ." That's our commitment for Steeling—to search out the truth and defend it from God's perspective!
