County Health Talk

E. Coli bacteria can be a serious disease

By Susan Roelfs E. Coli bacteria can be a serious disease, but it's a disease that is preventable. People should cook ground beef until it is brown all the way through. The regulations for food establishments say that ground beef is to be cooked to an internal temperature of at least 155 degrees Fahrenheit. Proper cooking will destroy the E. Coli bacteria.

Although E. Coli does not become airborne, it is possible for the bacteria to be transmitted from person to person from unwashed hands. People should always wash their hands for at least 20 seconds with soap and warm running water before and after cooking and eating, and when leaving the rest room. People who do not wash after using the toilet may carry the bacteria on their hands.

E. Coli may also be passed from raw meats to any surface. Plates, utensils and cutting boards, which have had raw meats, should therefore not be used for serving food until they have been washed and sanitized.

As is the case with many other illnesses, older persons, young children and people with compromised immune systems are those who are most likely to become seriously ill if exposed to E. Coli.

The Kansas Department of Health and Environment and local health agencies actively investigate all reported cases of E. Coli and are continuing to watch for cases in Kansas. Since January, there have been 11 confirmed cases of E. Coli reported in the state. One case has been linked to the recent national outbreak investigation of E. Coli related to eating recalled ground beef.

So, remember to wash your hands and cook meat properly to stay healthy.
