Kansan makes money on meteorites

GREENSBURG (AP) — For Steve Arnold, money can sometimes literally fall out of the sky.

The Wichita native recently found a 1,400-pound pallasite meteorite near Greensburg in south-central Kansas. It was the largest of its type ever found in the United States and could be worth between $1 million and $3 million, experts said.

And Arnold is taking unusual steps to ensure that he and the owners of land where any other meteorites fell will cash in on the unusual "crop."

He has signed leases with the owners of about 3,000 acres in the area to look for more meteorites. Arnold pays them for hunting rights, and they get a share of his sales if he finds a meteorite on their land.

"I've never heard of anyone doing that before," said Jeffrey Grossman, a geochemist and secretary of the Meteoritical Society, an international planetary science organization.

Arnold's partner and lawyer, Phil Mani of San Antonio, Texas, said the contracts are necessary because meteorites are otherwise the property of owners of the land where they fall.

Arnold, who lives in northern Arkansas, makes his living trading and selling meteorites, which are sought by museums, universities and collectors. His new find is being kept in Texas.
