Rains bring relief to wetland area

GREAT BEND (AP) — The Cheyenne Bottoms are wet again, and none too soon.

The wetland has been plagued by drought for the last three years, but recent rains have brought needed relief in time for fall migrations, when millions of birds will pass

"It got kind of depressing working at a wetland that wasn't wet," said Karl Grover, manager of the state-run wildlife area in central Kansas' Barton County. "This is a night-and-day difference from where we were last week."

Walnut Creek drainage area, which feeds into Cheyenne Bottoms.

On Tuesday, wading birds hunted prey and blue-winged teal flew low over the marsh. And with a diversion canal feeding more than 2,000 gallons per second into the area, conditions were still improving.

"It's probably been about 10 years since I've seen this kind of water coming in," Grover said.

That's good news for the birds about 300 species in all — that either make their homes in Chevenne Bottoms or pass through on their migrations each year. The list includes such threatened or endangered species as bald eagles, whooping cranes, peregrine falcons and least terns.

Better conditions also mean a larger influx of migrating waterfowl, which local tourism officials hope will draw more hunters to the

Kayakers find ancient skull

LAWRENCE (AP) — What started as a kayaking jaunt turned into a journey into Kansas' prehistoric past.

Four family members — brothers Mark and Garry Bichelmeyer, their cousin Mike Billups, and Garry Bichelmeyer's grandson, Kyler Mogusar — were out on the Wakarusa River on Aug. 16 when they found some bones exposed by low water levels.

Garry Bichelmeyer didn't recognize what he had found at first, mistaking the first piece for a rock or log. Not long after that, though, the brothers were pulling a jawbone as long as a man's arm out of the riverbed.

"Mark was just as muddy as a cat out of a hole," Garry Bichelmeyer said. "He was excited, and of course the excitement spread. We just went crazy when we saw the teeth."

The Bichelmeyers know their animal carcasses — both have always worked as butchers and meat cutters — and this was like nothing they'd seen before.

"It was so gigantic as compared to cattle or buffalo, things that we've worked with," said Garry Bichelmeyer, of Tonganoxie. "So we knew it had to be an elephant or a prehistoric animal."

Actually, it was both.

Larry Martin, the curator of vertebrate paleontology at the University of Kansas Museum of Natural History, said the kayakers found a fragmented but nearly complete skull of an American mastodon, an ancient relative of the modern pachyderm.

Martin estimated the skull's age at 10,000 to 20,000 years, and called the find significant.

"For instance, we don't have one in the museum here and we've been around for nearly 120 years," he said. "If in 120 years we haven't found one, then it's pretty rare."

Rare enough, he said, that only 20 to 30 American mastodon skulls have been found in the entire country — and none before in Kansas. Mastodons were more common in what is now Missouri because of its spruce forests, Martin said. Mastodon bones have been found in the Wakarusa before, though, most notably by former University of Kansas Chancellor Francis Huntington Snow. In the late 1800s, he was fishing on the river when he discovered that the "rock" he was standing on was actually a mastodon's lower jaw. "It is one of the oldest catalog specimens in our collection," Martin said. Mark Bichelmeyer, of De Soto, said the group took pains not to leave any pieces of this skull be-

"We weren't going to leave it there, because we didn't even know where we were," he said. "The jaw and everything weighed about 80 pounds and the rest of the pieces weighed nearly the same."

Great Bend Convention and Visitors Bureau, said a good year can see hundreds of hunters each day buying outdoor gear, eating in local restaurants and filling motel rooms.

"Conservatively we say people who visit Cheyenne Bottoms are spending $150 a day," Collier said. "The last two years, waterfowl season has been virtually nonexistent. We're pretty excited.'

Tom Curtis, of nearby Ellinwood, said he's looking forward to better hunting this season.

"I came out for something to Up to 8 inches of rain fell on the make me smile. It's looking better already," Curtis said. "I've lived around Great Bend since 1952, and I'd never seen the bottoms as dry as the last couple of years. I guess I'd better start getting some stuff ready."

Chris Collier, president of the Sept. 9. The goose season, the last to end, closes Feb. 18.

The wetlands' resurgence also is a boon for those who do their hunting with a birdwatchers' guide and Mike Rader, of Wilson, said birders have been buzzing over the chance to see more species at Cheyenne Bottoms.

The change has been less noticeable at the Quivira National Wildlife Refuge southeast of Great Bend, but things are better there, Manager Dave Hilley said some areas have gone from exposed mud to being covered by 12 to 18 inches

"It's a big plus," Hilley said. "It should get us through (winter)."
