Work behind schedule on Wichita River project

WICHITA (AP) — A $20.6 million beautification project at the confluence of the Arkansas and Little Arkansas rivers is more than two months behind schedule but remains on budget.

The project, which began in May 2005, had been expected to be done in October but is about 75 days behind schedule. It is now projected to open to the public in early spring, with a formal dedication set for May 18.

The project's centerpiece, the Keeper of the Plains statue, remains majestically perched atop a rock outcropping behind the Mid-America All-Indian Center. Its pedestal is complete, and the flagstone plaza at its base is almost finished.

Work on two suspension bridges that will connect riverbank pathways to the site of artist Blackbear Bosin's statue has yet to be done. Crews began attaching cables between the support towers and bridge deck last week.

"The bridges are just going to be gorgeous," said Stan Breitenbach, special projects coordinator for the city of Wichita. "I think the public is really going to be surprised when we turn the lights on this at night."

The delay has been blamed on defective concrete bridge decks that had to be recast.

Observation plazas near Veterans Memorial Park are complete. A new sidewalk and limestone support walls extend along the riverbank below the Westar Energy building. Art work and descriptive plaques remain to be installed on two "interpretive walls" shading the plaza.

"The interpretive walls will have a series of artifacts that will be built depicting objects of the plains Indians," said Chris Brunner, a sculptor working on the project. "Graphic granite panels will explain their lifestyle; why they chose this place as sacred; their relationship with the buffalo; their relationship with the

Officials: Commissioner needs experience

TOPEKA (AP) — The next education commissioner needs experience as a school administrator and must be able to work with all political factions on the State Board of Education, public school officials say.

The state board is looking for a new commissioner because of last week's resignation of Bob Corkins after a little more than a year on the job.

Corkins, hired in October 2005 by the board's conservative Republican majority, was the state's first top education administrator in more than 80 years not to have served as a local superintendent first.

"We really need to regain our focus," Brenda Dietrich, superintendent of the Auburn-Washburn district in Shawnee County, told The Topeka Capital-Journal.

Corkins' appointment upset many educators, partly because he had run two small think tanks before the board hired him and had lobbied against large increases in education funding.

As commissioner, he reorganized the Department of Education to create a new school innovation division, and he advocated allowing more charter schools, set up by school districts but free from regulations to stimulate innovation.

"We saw Bob Corkins as a vehicle for change," said Sandy Lassiter, a member of the Kansas Association of Public Charter
