Proposal for protecting fetuses caught in debate

TOPEKA (AP) — Prompted by last year's murder of a pregnant Wichita teenager, legislators are renewing their push for a law aimed at protecting mothers-to-be and the fetuses they are carrying.

But efforts to eliminate what some lawmakers view as a gap in Kansas law are tangled up in the larger debate over abortion. Groups on both sides are working on rival proposals dealing with crimes against pregnant women and their fetuses.

Abortion opponents back a proposal to declare that the definition of "person" in the state's criminal code covers an "unborn child," from conception. Abortion rights supporters prefer alternatives such as creating a new crime of harming a fetus or increasing penalties for crimes against women and girls if they are pregnant.

The Senate Judiciary Committee agreed Tuesday to sponsor a bill increasing the penalties for homicides if the victim is pregnant, and abortion rights advocates planned a news conference Wednesday. The House Judiciary Committee plans to have a hearing Thursday on the abortion opponents' proposal.

"It's about punishment," said House Judiciary Committee Chairman Mike O'Neal, R-Hutchinson. "There's a void in the law. We need to do something about that."

However, abortion rights supporters continue to suspect the motives of legislators seeking a declaration that a fetus is a person, even if that change wouldn't apply to abortion. Kansans for Life, the state's largest anti-abortion group, has put such legislation at the top of its agenda for the year.

"It's the foot in the door, the camel's nose under the tent," said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman John Vratil, R-Leawood. "That's why it's an abortion bill, even though some people would contend it's not."

Thirty-five states have some sort of law making it a crime to kill or harm a fetus, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures, including Alabama, California, Illinois, Missouri and Ohio. However, laws vary state-to-state, and not all apply from conception.

In Kansas, a proposed "Unborn Victims of Violence Act" won House approval in 2002 and 2005, only to die in the Senate without a committee vote. The House also rejected a bill in 2004.

This year, advocates who back the abortion opponents' bill are calling the measure a proposed "Alexa's Law," naming it after the child 14-year-old Chelsea Ann Brooks was carrying. Her body was found in a field in mid-June, less than three weeks before she was due to give birth.

Three people were charged in the teenager's strangling. Authorities believe a 20-year-old was the child's father and paid $500 to have the girl killed to avoid a statutory rape charge. The family is backing the proposed "Alexa's Law," and supporters of the measure have a Web site.

Separate but identical proposals are sponsored by Wichita-area Republicans, Steve Brunk in the House and Phil Journey in the Senate.

Kathy Ostrowski, a lobbyist for Kansans for Life, said fetal homicide laws deal with the "wanted unborn," whose parents and grandparents frame ultrasound pictures or pin them on their refrigerators.

"They don't satisfy people who want to end abortion, and they don't satisfy people who want to keep abortion," she said. "They only satisfy crime victims' families who want the ability of a prosecutor to obtain maximum justice."

But Shawnee County District Attorney Robert Hecht said even if prosecutors can secure separate convictions for crimes against a woman and her fetus, a judge still can impose sentences that run simultaneously, not back-to-back. Also, a prosecutor who must prove that someone's action caused a woman to lose her baby will need access to high-quality forensic scientists, he said.

Ashley Anstaett, a spokeswoman for Attorney General Paul Morrison, who supports abortion rights, said: "The best way to deal with these kind of situations would be to enhance penalties for those who harm a pregnant woman."

Julie Burkhart, a lobbyist for the abortion rights group ProKanDo, said its proposed "Motherhood Protect Act" — which makes it a felony to harm a pregnant woman — would keep a legal focus on violence against women, who are statistically more likely to face abuse after getting pregnant.

"We have to get at that root cause," she said.

Backers of the proposed "Alexa's Law" like O'Neal view it as the simplest solution, a change likely to cover most future problems. But abortion rights supporters like Rep. Paul Davis, D-Lawrence, a Judiciary Committee member, still worry about backers' ultimate motives.

"If we're going to have a debate about abortion, let's have a debate about abortion," Davis said. "Let's not try to sneak it into other issues that are going to have ramifications which we don't comprehend."
