Wal-Mart employee Pat Wolf, left, raced Cayla Carter on tricycles during a Fourth of July carnival in the store's parking lot Wednesday. In addition to tricycle races, there was face painting, a bake sale, sno cones and other games. Money raised was to benefit the Children's Miracle Network and Genesis-Thomas County food bank.

How to help suffering children

Dear Dr. Brothers: I have two sensitive, nearly perfect, beautiful children — a little boy who's 3, and his 7-year-old sister. Until almost a month ago, I always started the above with "We have," but an Army officer brought the news of my husband's death, blown apart on some road in Iraq. I have the neatly folded flag, all the usual medals and the letters of condolence, and the bits of him that I can still love and hold are his children. I look at them, hug them and fight my tears and, I admit, a lot of anger. All I want now is for them not to suffer, but to enjoy life and turn into healthy adults we both could be proud of. Right now, I don't quite know how to make that happen. — H.A.

Dear H.A.: I'm sure that all your letters and all your friends must have mentioned that time is on your side and will help you and your family to heal. The memory of him and the pain of his loss will be with you all your life, but time and the needs of your children will make it much easier. It's almost as if the strength he had is now with you, and this will help and guide you.

You don't always have to pretend not feel his loss and the sadness you have in front of your children. They'll know this because they feel it too, and I suspect they also feel your anger, but in different ways and for different, less complicated reasons. Keep toys, books or letters from him around and let them become objects of comfort and solace, like a blanket or some piece of clothing that he wore. Stay active with other adults who can easily identify with your experiences and struggles, and keep your children's lives as normal as possible.

Dear Dr. Brothers: I'm very concerned about my younger sister, who's about halfway through her pregnancy. The past two times I've seen her, she's been depressed. Both she and her husband wanted this baby — her first — so badly. Now she can't seem to pull herself out of this low. It's driving her husband nuts. Our mom suffered from depression off and on, but my sister never did. At least, if she did, I never saw it. What's wrong with her? This should be a happy time. What can I do? — D.T.

Dear D.T.: Most of us have heard about postpartum depression, but are shocked to learn that up to 20 percent of females suffer from what's apparently happening to your sister: bouts of depression at some point during their pregnancy. Part of the reaction of surprise is that everyone expects that women and their families will be fulfilled and upbeat as they look forward to the new arrival.

Even though when, like your sister, the woman's been looking forward to the news that she was, at last, pregnant, psychologically the views of some change, and they may suddenly wonder if they've made a mistake and wonder how limiting this actually will be. Does it mean an end to the possibility of any dreams of a career? These questions and concerns can trigger any genetic tendencies that may be there for depression.

Also, changes in hormone levels are taking place, and this will affect moods. Encourage her to talk about her depression. Reassure her and her husband that she's not alone in this. She should discuss this with an understanding doctor, and she may also want to consider some short-term therapy to help with this problem rather than medication, which could be dangerous for the baby. Ear piercing dispute erupts at Wichita store

WICHITA (AP) — A woman was issued a warning for trespassing and asked to leave a Wal-Mart after she called police when she heard a young girl who was getting her ears pierced crying and screaming.

Marilyn Johnson said she was told she would no longer be allowed in the store after the incident occurred Sunday.

Johnson said she called 911 after trying to talk to the girl's mother and the employee who was doing the ear piercing. She said the girl, who she thought was about 5 years old, was "crying her eyes out."

"Her face was beet red, and she was screaming and coughing and saying things like, 'I don't want this! It hurts! Please stop!' She was grabbing her ears so the adults couldn't touch them," Johnson said.

Johnson said the women did not respond to her and continued trying to pierce the girl's ears.

"We're forever being told we should report any suspected child abuse," said Johnson, 53, of Wichita.

"I saw a child crying and screaming and pleading for someone not to do something to her. And if that's not child abuse, I don't know what is."

However, the girl's mother and the employee were not breaking any laws, Wichita police spokesman

Gordon Bassham said.

Kansas law requires written and notarized consent from a parent or legal guardian before someone under 18 can get a body piercing or tattoo. The law does not say whether piercings or tattoos can be forcibly administered.

"The parent was not, in the eyes of the officers, doing anything illegal," Bassham said.

"This could have been a cultural thing for the mother, or a religious thing. There are so many factors at work.

"For us as law enforcement to try and predict the reasons and the motivations behind this is not possible, and that's not our area."

The mother was not identified by police or store officials.

At the request of a Wal-Mart official, police issued Johnson a warning for trespassing and escorted her from the store, Bassham said.

In a written statement, Wal-Mart spokesman Dan Fogleman said: "Ear piercing is a service that Wal-Mart offers to our customers of all ages. A parent or legal guardian's signature is required if the person having their ears pierced is under 18 years old, which was the case in this instance.

In cases where a child opposes the piercings, Fogleman said: "Local management has discretion based on the individual circumstance."
