Father's death prompts questions

Dear Dr. Brothers: I'm a 40year-old woman getting married for the first time, and I'm thrilled — more thrilled than I would've been if I'd met this same man 20 years ago. My awareness of something is beginning to haunt me and also, I believe, my mother, although during all these years she's said little. The point is, I was an only child, and my father was devoted to me, thought I was the smartest, brightest female he'd ever seen and was fiercely protective, really so possessive that any boyfriends I had got away fast. He died a year ago, and now once again, my mom and I have become close. What happened? He never touched me inappropriately, in most ways he was a good father, but something happened.

Dear N.S.: Apparently, without anyone in the family being consciously aware of it, your close family had, unfortunately, developed into a triangle, and I suspect that while your mother loved you too, she felt displaced in terms of her relationship with her husband. She must have felt ers. jealous of you, just as your father felt jealous of young men once you reached adolescence and started to think about dat-

You may have sensed her feelings toward you, which made your own relationship with her more difficult. This is the kind of situation that could've been cor- marriage has busted up. What is it may not have been clear enough for your parents to recognize the need for it. It's a wonderful thing that you're getting married now to someone you love and that you and your mother are able to be truly close again.

Ask Dr. Brothers

Dear Dr. Brothers: I'm the youngest, now 20, in a family with three siblings -- two older brothers and the firstborn, my sister. Basically, I think our family life was happier than most in many ways, and we had any number of advantages that poorer, less-fortunate families don't have. I have one complaint, and it is that my parents, while great, are what I call ultraconventional in most areas, and are relentless marriage push-

Now that I've fallen in love with someone, they're starting on me, and I want them to butt out. Last night, I blurted out at a dinner they gave that they should've learned from the past that their way spells disaster.

All my siblings have been divorced, and my sister's second rected in family therapy, but it with them and this whole country and the marriage thing?

> Dear V.M.: In the past several decades, we've tended to romanticize marriage to such an extent that most young people's unrealistic expectations of it have made it less and less likely to succeed. First of all, marriage has always been a very personal matter -- in essence, not the business of the government (state or federal), nor should it matter what inlaws think, or even members of

> As long as a young person has reached a certain age, whether or not that couple marries should be up to the two people the immediate family.

Marriages that don't take place too quickly, in which both partners have had a chance to mature and preferably finish schooling, are more likely to work, and those that are successful (and there are still many) are probably much happier and more rewarding for both partners and their children than they were in the distant past.

Casey L. Denneler, 22, has been charged in Thomas County District Court with one count each of rape, obstruction of duty, aggravated indecent solicitation of a child and contributing to a child's misconduct or deprivation. Denneler was arrested at 6 a.m. May 25, when Colby Police ments looking for the girl.

The child's parents reported her missing at 4:55 a.m. on May 25 and told officers the girl had prison and a fine up to $100,000
