Smokin'!

JOHN VAN NOSTRAND/Colby Free Press

Onlookers watch a car blow out smoke from its tailpipe Saturday during Colby's Cruise to the Past Rod Run. For a minimal fee, people could guess how long they thought the car would run without certain fluids in the engine. Larry Havel won the prize with a guess of 2 minutes and 35 seconds. The car quit in 2 minutes 37 seconds.

KU students spend week digging at Kanorado site

A small group of graduate students from the University of Kansas spent this week digging at the oldest archeological site in the state within sight of the state was found, and more rock flakes line and a mile south of Kanorado as evidence the area may have remains show the area was much along Middle Beaver Creek.

Excavation continues on the worked on with scrapers. 14,000-year-old Paleoindian site, and this summer a ground-penetrating radar unit has been brought to try to develop a three-dimensional image of the area south of the creek bank where the dig site is located.

The KU graduate students were staying in the dorms this week at the Northwest Kansas Technical have been to the Kanorado site College, and will be back with a before, and are continuing to work larger number for a field school on excavating the archeological beginning on Wednesday and lasting until June 27.

Firm to unveil process to allow ethanol plants to add food

COLWICH (AP) - Amid glob- velopment right now," said Ron leading designer of ethanol plants an industry trade group. plans to unveil on Monday a new technology that would allow processors of corn-based ethanol to produce food for human consumption as well as fuel.

ICM Inc. will introduce to its customers its advanced food and fuel technology, a "dry corn fractionation" process that allows the use of the entire corn kernel. The plan calls for the construction of separate facilities at ethanol plants where the dry corn kernel can be separated into its components endosperm, germ and bran - before it is contaminated in the later ethanol distillation process.

The new technology, at least on paper, could substantially increase revenues for ethanol plants while using no more corn than the facilities already need for ethanol. Instead of having so much leftover distilling grain good only for livestock feed, the new process will first separate out the corn germ for human food.

Today, less than 5 percent of the corn used by ethanol plants is also used for human food in a few wet milling ethanol plants. But most of the nation's ethanol plants are dry mills where corn is ground up and distilled traditionally with the byproducts going to animal feed.

Lamberty said the technology proposed by ICM would be a new process for dry mills and would impact many ethanol plants in the United States.
