Kleptomaniac fears repercussions

Dear Dr. Brothers: I've been seeing a therapist for some emotional and control issues, but I have a problem that I haven't brought up with him because I'm afraid I'll get in trouble. Whenever I go shopping or go into a store, I get an overwhelming urge to take things. I don't take anything big, or even anything I need or can't pay for, but there's something about getting away with taking a candy bar or a key ring that makes me feel really good. Last week I took a pair of earrings from a good friend of mine, and denied I had them when monetary gain - and in kleptomashe asked because I felt so guilty. Am I a kleptomaniac? What can I do to stop without getting thrown in jail?

Kleptomaniacs will impulsively steal inexpensive or unneeded objects - unlike shoplifters, who usually plan out their crime and are motivated by need or nia, this stealing is accompanied by intense feelings of guilt and wrongdoing. It does sound like the kleptomania may be wrapped up with the other issues that you have been Dear K.B.: It's good that you seeing a therapist for, so you cerhave realized that your urge to tainly should mention this to him steal is not normal, and that you as well. He will be able to help you want to stop doing it. You needn't a lot more if you are totally honest with him about yourself.

He insists that it perience the positive emotions that wasn't a big deal, and that he just you feel from "getting away with made a mistake, not knowing when but you need to keep a perspective when evaluating not only your son's decision-making but also the role of the college administration in the incident. Your son is old enough to be in college, which means that he is old enough to take responsibility for his actions and decisions. He might not always make the right decision, or take the action that you think is best, but college is a time when young adults want to test their boundaries.
