I've been dat- with as many people as we need ing a guy for about two years. We in order to feel happy. We all draw live in the same general neighbor- sustenance from some kind of there can be none of the great feelhood, about five miles apart, and socializing. But we don't always know how much we need. I've ments, he pretty much spends all seen self-described loners who his time here. That's actually the went too far in setting themselves problem. As much as I love him, I up like a hermit, and lived to regret am not getting the downtime, the it — and social types who at some "me time" and peace of mind that point said, "Enough already!" and I need from being sort of a loner at had to go off by themselves for a

The good news, though, is that Dear C.S.: It is an amazing fact you know yourself well enough of human nature that there is so to be able to say you have specific company we each want to keep, the smothering you feel is not due boyfriend. It's a delicate matter to explain this to him without hurting his feelings, but you're going to have to do your best — cite as many examples as you can of occasions when you were so glad to see him. If you're always together, ings you have after being separated and then getting back together again. He will understand, if he really knows you, but he might need extra reassurance to know this isn't a pre-breakup ploy. As long as you are honest with yourself, you most likely will be honest with him.
