Democrats gain Senate, House seats

WASHINGTON (AP) — Democrats broadened their control of Congress in Tuesday’s elections, though in the Senate they fell short of the 60 votes needed for a filibuster-proof majority that would have given them almost unbridled power over legislation.

Voters ousted Senate Republicans in North Carolina and New Hampshire and added three seats held by retiring GOP incumbents to the Democrats’ fragile 51-49 majority. Four other Senate races involving Republican incumbents, including the contest in Minnesota, were too close to call early today. The GOP retained some leverage in spite of Democratic gains.

“The people have spoken. We hear the people and now it’s time to come behind our president,” Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, told “The Early Show” on CBS today. “The Senate is going to have to work things out in a bipartisan way, and I think the test is going to be right there.”

The Associated Press called the Senate race in Minnesota prematurely. Republican Sen. Norm Coleman finished ahead of Democrat Al Franken in the final vote count, but Coleman’s 571-vote margin falls within the state’s mandatory recount law. That law requires a recount any time the margin between the top two candidates is less than one-half of 1 percent.

The AP also took back a call in a central Ohio race. Republican Steve Stivers finished ahead of Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy early today, but the Franklin County board of elections said later that the unofficial vote count reported by the county included results from two other counties in the 15th district.

In the House, Democrats captured GOP-held seats in the Northeast, South and West, adding at least 18 seats to the 30 they took from Republicans in 2006. Democrats saw potential gains in as many as five more undetermined seats. Going into Tuesday’s election, Democrats controlled the House 235-199 with one vacancy.

“Tonight, the American people have called for a new direction. They have called for change in America,” House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada credited the excitement and record turnout that helped propel president-elect Barack Obama to victory.

“Obama ran a terrific campaign, he inspired millions of people,” Reid said in a telephone interview. “It’s been a really good night.”

Even as they celebrated Obama’s election and their own victories, Democratic leaders pivoted to looming issues big and small, from a lame-duck congressional session this month to whether to punish or tolerate a Senate ally who endorsed Republican John McCain.
