motorcycle, and paid $25.75 in cash for a night on the grounds, said Caroline Hastings, 32, who owns and operates the campground with her husband. She gave him a code to use wireless Internet, four bottles of water and six bundles of firewood. He also bought a sixpack of Bud Light Lime, and said he was leaving in the morning, she said. But by Tuesday, he still wasn't gone, and hadn't paid for another night.

"He said he was going across the country with some buddies. He wanted to stop. He didn't know if they would," Hastings said.

County jail pending extradition to Indiana, a sheriff's office spokes-

Deputy U.S. Marshal John Beeman of the Southern District of Indiana said Schrenker will likely be brought back to Hamilton County, just north of Indianapolis, where a judge issued an arrest warrant Tuesday on felony fraud charges alleging that Schrenker acted as a financial adviser after his state license expired on Dec. 31.

Evidence, including the motorcycle authorities believe Schrenker used to get away, was being analyzed this morning, Chiumento said. He wouldn't describe what else was found at the Chattahoochee campground, but did say the investigation revealed Schrenker was prepared to be on the run for some time.

Schrenker fled not only the law but divorce, a state investigation of his businesses and angry investors who accuse him of stealing potentially millions in savings they entrusted to him.
