edge sometime,” she added.

Unger said she would like to find a job in public policy in Washington, and wants to be there for a while and maybe work for an institute that does research and writing.

She would like to work in foreign policy and meet with lawmakers, she said, because that is her favorite.

She said she believes this administration is doing much more with foreign policy than was done in the past, and her special area of interest right now is policy with the Middle East.

“Things are looking pretty good,” she said, “but it is hard to get a job because so many people are looking.

“I’m not sure I’m quite ready, as a 22 year old, for a State Department commitment, and I want to do some post-grad work in international relations first,” Unger said. “It is such an eye opener to be in Washington and see how tough it is.”

She said she took some time to have fun while she was in Europe.

“I ate lots of chocolate, traveled to Paris, Amsterdam, London, Dublin and some exciting places,” she said. “I had been to Europe before, but this time the atmosphere was different, and I was greeted with excitement when I said I was an American.

“Brussels is the heartbeat of Europe, of international places where people come together. They were bombed time after time in the war, and it was a center for destruction. Now they are trying to make it into a center for peace.

“One interesting thing was that we didn’t meet many Belgians because it is such a international city.

England is very anti-European Union, because they feel they are just a bit above the rest of Europe. There seems to be a democratic deficit, because they (England) feel Brussels makes the laws, and Brussels is sort of a bad word for the English.”

When asked if she had an opinion of the Iranian situation, Unger said she feels it is Iran’s situation, and praised President Obama for keeping the U.S. out of it. She said she was also proud of the people there who are supporting the idea of a democracy and women’s rights.

She said she is leaving for Washington again this week It has been nice spending time at home and being close to her parents, she said, but it would be satisfying to have a job working in public policy.

Unger said her internship probably was the best opportunity and experience in her life, to get to see the differences and the similarities of the people whose paths she crossed. She said she learned a lot and met some great people.

Graduate certified in service learning

A Colby woman, Clarissa Marie Unger, was among 261 students from more than 50 disciplines recognized at a ceremony May 7 at the University of Kansas for completing certification in “service learning” during the 2008-2009 school year.

Service learning, the university says, is a form of experiential education in which students participate in service that addresses community needs and increases the students’ understanding of course materials through application and reflection. To receive certification, the university says, students must complete four components: a service learning course, an independent service project, a set of directed civic engagement and leadership readings, and reflection on their experiences.

In addition to the certificates presented during the ceremony, students also received certification designation on their official transcripts. This notation represents the time and effort devoted to service learning classes and activities that foster civic engagement, community involvement and leadership.

Unger, who earned a Bachelor of Arts in political science, is the daughter of Jeffrey and Marilyn Unger of Colby.

From Decatur Community High, Megan Diane (Barrett) Sage graduated with a Bachelor of Social Work. She is the daughter of James and Diane Barrett, Oberlin.

Rights violated in strip search

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court ruled today that school officials violated an Arizona teenage girl rights by strip-searching her for prescription-strength ibuprofen, saying U.S. educators should not force children to remove their clothing unless student safety is at risk.

In an 8-1 ruling, the justices said that Safford Middle School officials violated the Fourth Amendment ban on unreasonable searches with their treatment of Savana Redding. However, the court also ruled that the school officials cannot be held financially liable for their search.

Redding was 13 when the educators in rural eastern Arizona conducted the search. They were looking for pills — the equivalent of two Advils. The district bans prescription and over-the-counter drugs and the school was acting on a tip from another student.

The school’s search of Redding’s backpack and outer clothes was permissible, the court said. But the justices said that officials went too far when they asked to search her underwear.

to anybody else.”

“The court’s decision sends a clear signal to school officials that they can strip search students only in the most extraordinary situations,” added her lawyer, Adam Wolf of the American Civil Liberties Union Foundation.

In a dissent, Justice Clarence Thomas found the search legal and said the court previously had given school officials “considerable leeway” under the Fourth Amendment in school settings.

Officials had searched the girl’s backpack and found nothing, Thomas said. “It was eminently reasonable to conclude the backpack was empty because Redding was secreting the pills in a place she thought no one would look,” Thomas said.

The court also ruled the officials cannot be held liable in a lawsuit for the search. Different judges around the nation have come to different conclusions about immunity for school officials in strip searches, which leads the Supreme Court to “counsel doubt that we were sufficiently clear in the prior statement of law,” Souter said.

The justices also said the lower courts would have to determine whether the Safford Unified School District No. 1 could be held liable.

A schoolmate had accused Redding, then an eighth-grade student, of giving her pills.

The school’s vice principal, Kerry Wilson, took Redding to his office to search her backpack. When nothing was found, Redding was taken to a nurse’s office where she says she was ordered to take off her shirt and pants. Redding said they then told her to move her bra to the side and to stretch her underwear waistband, exposing her breasts and pelvic area. No pills were found.

A federal magistrate dismissed a suit by Redding and her mother, April. An appeals panel agreed that the search didn’t violate her rights. But last July, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals found the search was “an invasion of constitutional rights” and that Wilson could be found personally liable.
