

VERA SLOAN/Colby Free Press

Sowers serves burgers, fries and more to the crowd at the Colby Livestock Auction cafe on Thursdays. She said she doesn't just feed farmers, but a good cross-section of the community and some people who come to town just for the restaurant.

ies locally, to support the home-town stores.

Sowers broke her ankle a couple of years ago, but says she still went to work, but just delegated more of it to granddaughters and other relatives.

On sale day, she has the cafe open at 10 a.m., she said, and never closes until all the help from the barn and pens have been fed.

For fun, Sowers says she likes to sing and has a 'girls night out' once a week to sing with the Sweet Adelines, a women's barber-shop group. She also has flowers and chickens, helps her husband with the cattle when he needs her, and would have a garden except that the combine is parked in the spot she wants to plant.

She says for now she's content to make pies and serve food to people that seem to enjoy it, and sees no reason to quit when she's doing something she really likes to do.
