Governor hopefuls debate

tried to tap voter discontent with Congress by pointing to Brownback's service there, even with Brownback criticizing Washington himself.

"You just heard Sam talking about the federal government - he IS the federal government," Holland said during the debate, after the GOP nominee expressed concern about the federal debt. "Mr. Brownback needs to come home and get out of government."

Holland said he supported raising the state's sales tax from 5.3 percent to 6.3 percent, which he said has helped prevent further severe cuts in aid to public schools and other government programs.

Holland also opposed a proposed "health care freedom" amendment to the state Constitution, designed to thwart parts of the federal law, most notably a mandate that most Americans buy insurance, starting in 2014. Brownback said repealing that law is "the best thing that could happen for America."

"We've got to get the atmosphere right," he said. "Atmosphere right is getting taxes down, holding taxes down and holding regulations down."

After the debate, Holland dismissed Brownback's attempt to link him to Obama by saying, "He's a politician. He'll try to tie me to anything he thinks is unpopular."

Dry weather is good news for milo

August, and yields may suffer because of the heat this year. What the dry weather will do, Olson said, is speed up harvest since the corn is drying faster than usual.

Some dryland corn fields west of Colby have already been cut. Those fields, Olson said, have about 14-15 percent moisture. Still, he predicted, the corn crop may not be as good as last year.

Corn is typically harvested earlier than milo because milo needs a killing freeze, the agronomist said. The freeze can harm the crop if it comes too early, or if the milo hasn't matured enough.

Olson said county farmers have been planting fewer milo acres in favor of more corn and soy beans. Agriculture Department statistics show farmers in northwest Kansas planted 240,000 acres of milo last year and averaged about 79 bushels per acre. Farmers planted about 2.7 million acres across Kansas. Figures for this season were not yet available.

Sorghum center looks at ways to improve crop

A researcher's suggestion to establish a center for sorghum improvement at Kansas State University is helping the state and region and is expected to ultimately benefit millions of people worldwide.

Why a sorghum research center in the Wheat State?

Scott Staggenborg, an agronomist and crop researcher at K-State, says Kansas is the leading producer of grain sorghum in the U.S. In 2008, farmers and ranchers in the state produced 45.4 percent (214,500,000 bushels) of the nation's crop and in 2009, 58.6 percent (224,400,000 bushels).

"Grain sorghum is, however, more than a cash crop for Kansas," said Staggenborg, who credited both statistics to "Kansas Farm Facts," a U.S. Department of Agriculture publication.

He credited Mitch Tuinstra, a former sorghum breeder at K-State, for the idea.

"Increasing interest in grain sorghum is driving research in crop production (plant breeding to increase yields, insect and disease resistance, weed control, and production strategies, for example), and applications for grain-based food and grain products," Staggenborg, said.

Sorghum is a gluten-free grain, and that makes it a candidate as the grain base in the expanding gluten-free product market, he said. It also is a rich source of naturally occurring plant-based phytochemicals and antioxidants known to have cancer-preventing qualities.

"Establishing the center at K-State made a lot of sense," said Staggenborg, citing collaborations across six departments in the College of Agriculture, as well as departments in the Colleges of Engineering and Human Ecology, and with the Center for Grain and Animal Health Research operated in Manhattan, Kan., by the federal Agricultural Research Service.

The addition of collaborative research with Texas A&M and Texas Tech, both located in a sorghum-producing state, has prompted a recent name change (from the Center for Sorghum

COLBY POLICE DEPARTMENT
 Cameras caught the man inside the motel at 12:18, while the remodeling crew was at lunch. When the men returned, they found several hundred dollars worth of tools missing.

Jones said police are looking for the man as a "person of interest." He said the man may have just been passing through or been in town on one of the many construction crews in the area. Anyone with information on his identity should call the police department at 460-4460.
