the radio. By the time I got back home, not 10 minutes later, the second plane hit the second tower and the first tower was in flames. I was dumbfounded. I watched in horror as I cried and prayed for those inside.

As the day unfolded more and more information came out. I have to stop or I won't be able to go on. Even today 10 years later, those memories of 9/11 and the days and weeks that followed, still hurt, immensely. I would venture to say that the memories of Dec. 7, 1941, hurt just as much for those who saw it or heard it on their radios.

I also recall there were no jet trails in the sky for several days afterward. You can see dozens of them on a normal day.

I considered myself patriotic before 9/11, but since that fateful day, I am even more so. For several years we had red, white and blue Christmas trees with American flags and angels on them. The Star-Spangled Banner always moved me, but now more meaning than ever. We keep one of the flags from the paper on our door through all seasons. We had red, white and blue ribbons on our vehicles.

Cash-strapped governors split over jobs plan

By David A. Lieb

Associated Press

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. jobs plan calls for $130 billion in aid to state and local governments, providing either a welcome infusion of cash for those struggling with budget gaps, government layoffs and crumbling roads or merely a temporary patch for budget holes that are likely to remain long after the federal money runs out.

The perspective of governors and state lawmakers varies but often follows political affiliation, with Democrats generally praising Obama's plan and Republicans remaining skeptical.

"It's a no-brainer: Congress should pass the bill. Now," said California Gov. Jerry Brown, a Democrat, whose state would receive some $13 billion for construction projects and teaching and public safety jobs at a time when it has the nation's second highest unemployment rate.

Many Republican lawmakers and governors are less enthusiastic about accepting the federal money, especially if it locks in costs they will have to account for once the aid runs out.

homes or businesses. It would mark the second, sizable infusion of federal cash to states in less than three years, President Barack Obama's latest coming just as they are burning through the last of the billions of dollars they received under the 2009 stimulus act.

> In many cases, states used the original stimulus money to fill in for declining tax revenue and lessen or delay spending cuts for public schools, health care programs and other services. But those budget holes remain in many states as high unemployment persists and government tax revenue remains lackluster.

With another round of money, "the federal government may be able to play a critical role in helping states close their budget gaps," said David Adkins, executive director of the Council of State Governments.

But he said the prospects for receiving the money appear "very, very slim" given the focus on reducing government spending among Republicans in Congress. He said state government leaders are more interested in long-term stable federal funding for transportation projects and education programs.

In New Mexico, Democratic Obama's plan has to clear a state Sen. State budget officials have only estimates of how much they would receive under the Obama proposal, which was announced Thursday to a joint session of Congress. They are waiting to learn exactly how those dollars would be disbursed and what strings, if any, would be attached.

Some Republican governors already have established a precedent of rejecting portions of the federal stimulus money.

A state-by-state breakdown of the president's plan shows that Florida could receive more than $7.5 billion for schools, roads and other projects. That money would come into a state with a 10.7 percent unemployment rate and one of the nation's highest home foreclosure rates. But Scott spokesman Brian Burgess left open the possibility that the Florida governor could reject money under Obama's latest plan, especially if it added to the federal debt.

$200 million budget gap created have required Texas to adopt a more generous program.

While it is not clear whether "I'm one of those who would the Obama proposal would require Texas to rewrite its unemployment laws, it would extend the benefits of nearly 124,000 people in the state.

Kansas Gov. Sam Brownback, a Republican who as a U.S. senator voted against Obama's 2009 stimulus legislation, did not say whether Kansas would accept federal money under Obama's latest proposal. But he said the use of one-time revenue in the earlier stimulus program created budget problems for the state when the funding expired.

Other governors, particularly Democrats, welcomed the potential for more federal aid.

"We need all the help we can get," said Vermont Gov. Peter Shumlin, a Democrat whose state remains devastated by flooding from the remnants of Hurricane Irene.

"I think the hopes that we had for our recovery have been stalled for all kinds of reasons that are beyond Vermont's control," Shumlin told The Associated Press. "But it seems to me that the president's package for job growth and infrastructure investment is the right thing to Republican Texas Gov. Rick help us avoid a double-dip re-
