African Americans' local history had an impact on national events

Sometimes people feel their own local history is dull and inconsequential compared to the dramatic sweep of events on a national and global scale.

But the fact is, what happens locally is often "the rest of the story" for some of those broader events. The Homestead Act, for example, was a national milestone – but the stories of how this legislation played out in hundreds of communities just like our own across the Plains are what give the document its substance and meaning.

It can work the other way, too. The local community can have a significant impact on the kinds of historic national events we read about in textbooks. One story of this sort will be featured this month at the museum in a couple of exhibits we will be hosting beginning Wednesday and in a talk given by Angela Bates at noon Thursday. It concerns both African American settlement in Kansas, and the landmark 1954 Supreme Court decision that overturned school segregation in Brown versus Board of Education.

We heard this remarkable story first from Lloyd Theimer. He until she retired. In 1943 she mar-

Zelma Hurst Henderson was born on Feb. 29, 1920. Her grandfather, Thomas L. Hurst, had been a slave in Missouri and Arkansas before emancipation. Her parents had been born and raised in Jefferson County, heading west to Thomas County in 1916. They farmed and raised cattle, until the hard and dirty 1930s when they moved to Oakley. ried Andrew Henderson, and it would be disruptive for the races segregation was mandatory for elementary schools in towns with populations of 20,000 or more. When Donald started school, he had to be bused across town to a black school even though there were white schools much closer.

Here's where the local story comes into play. Zelma Henderson was upset about her children going to segregated schools because her own experience in northwest Kansas had been a fully integrated one. "I had good friends, we got along, there were no problems," she said of her school years. She felt that it was important for the races to learn and play together in school so that they were not strangers to one another as adults in the work environment.

When the Brown v. Topeka Board of Education case was being pulled together, Zelma Henderson was specifically invited to participate as a plaintiff because of her experience growing up in integrated schools. Her testimony was meant to counter the argument that they had two children, Don- to attend classes together, as this ald and Vicky. At that time, clearly had not been a problem at Prairie Bell and Oakley Schools.

In a 2001 interview about her involvement in the case, Zelma recalled, "I was asked in the court, 'Were your brothers in sports?' They all played in sports, track, baseball, and we did, too. In fact, I was called down by the judge because I spoke out of turn. I said, 'Even the girls." Zelma Henderson was the last surviving plaintiff from Brown v. Board of Education when she died on May 20, 2008, at age 88.

This is a great example of how the local story can hugely affect the national one. Zelma and her classmates, black and white, went to school together during the 1920s and '30s at Prairie Bell and Oakley Schools. I somehow doubt that most of them thought it was anything very unusual or noteworthy at the time. And yet, many years later, this ordinary experience in these ordinary communities became a key element in the landmark case that ended legal segregation in public schools once

Program looks at femininity

For women who have ever struggled with feeling less than feminine and have a hard time remembering that their beauty does not come from outward appearance or style, College Drive Assembly of God Church is the place to be at 7 p.m. Thursday, says Stephanie Todd, women's ministry leader for the church.

Todd said she is issuing a personal invitation to "Feminine and Fabulous," to women who struggle with feeling that today's society expects them to be a certain size, to age without ever showing the signs and to embrace immodest apparel and brassy speech.

Todd noted that although it may not be easy to answer "yes" to Dr. in Colby, and they hope to see some of the issues, it is a reality for many women.
