American war journalist killed by shelling in Syria

By Danica Kirka The Associated Press

LONDON (AP) - She was instantly recognizable for the eye patch that hid a shrapnel injury – a testament to Marie Colvin's courage, which took her behind the front lines of the world's the suffering of individuals trapped in war.

After more than two decades of chronicling conflict, Colvin became a victim of it Thursday, killed by shelling in the besieged Syrian city of Homs.

Colvin, 56, died alongside Ochlik, the French government announced. Freelance photog-Edith Bouvier of Le Figaro were wounded.

Colvin, from East Norwich, New York, had been a foreign correspondent for Britain's Sunday Times for more than 25 years, making a specialty of reporting from the world's most dangerous places.

The newspaper posted her final dispatch outside the website's paywall, so anyone could read her account from a cellar offering refuge for women and children. The report chronicled the horrors that eventually took her own life.

"It is a city of the cold and hungry, echoing to exploding shells and bursts of gunfire,' Colvin wrote. "There are no telephones and the electricity fills potholes and snow drifts in and described her daughter as a ping out of Syria.

through windows empty of glass. No shops are open, so families are sharing what they have with relatives and neighbors. Many of the dead and injured are those who risked foraging for food." Colvin often focused on the plight of women and children in wartime, and Syria was no deadliest conflicts to write about different. She gave interviews to major British broadcasters on the eve of her death, appealing for the world to notice the slaughter taking place.

"I watched a little baby die today," she told the BBC on Tuesday. "Absolutely horrific, a 2-year old child had been hit. French photojournalist Remi They stripped it and found the shrapnel had gone into the left chest and the doctor said 'I can't rapher Paul Conroy and writer do anything.' His little tummy just kept heaving until he died."

In the 1990s, Colvin worked in the Balkans, where she went on patrol with the Kosovo Liberation Army as it engaged Serb military forces. She worked in Chechnya, where she came under fire from Russian jets while reporting on Chechen rebels seeking independence for their region. She also covered the conflict in East Timor after its in suffering to relay the horror people voted for independence of war. in Southeast Asia.

She was one of the few reporters to interview ousted Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi in his on the uprising against Syria's final days before his death in October.

Her mother, Rosemarie Colvin, of East Norwich, N.Y., told the Associated Press that her Times, died last week of an aphas been cut off. ... Freezing rain daughter knew Gadhafi well, parent asthma attack while slip-passionate about her work, even when it got hard.

"She was supposed to leave (Syria) today," Rosemarie Colvin said, adding that her daughter had spoken yesterday with her editor who ordered her to leave because it was so dangerous. "She had to stay. She wanted to finish one more story."

The eldest of five children, Colvin is survived by her mother, two sisters and two brothers. Rosemarie Colvin invited reporters into her home, fighting back the tears.

"The reason I've been talking to all you guys is that I don't want my daughter's legacy to be 'no comment' ... because she wasn't a 'no comment' person," she said. "Her legacy is: Be passionate and be involved in what you believe in. And do it as thoroughly and honestly and fearlessly as you can."

A graduate of Yale University, Colvin had never planned to be a journalist. She had studied anthropology, later taking the rigorous study of people and places and putting it to good use writing about individuals caught up

Colvin's death comes only days after two other respected journalists died while reporting president, Bashar Assad. Twotime Pulitzer Prize-winning reporter Anthony Shadid, a correspondent for The New York
