of Muslims are Arabs. About 60 percent of Muslims live in Asia, and one-fifth live in a country where they are a minority, Stanton said. She said she feels that Southeast Asia will become a major focus of U.S. foreign policy as we use the region as a "pivot" to deal with China. This will make Americans more aware of the Muslim population in that area.

Stanton showed a map of the Middle East, color coded according to how far countries had gone to changing their governments after the recent "Arab Spring" protests.

"Imagine what this map would have looked like two years ago," she said. "It would have all been one color."

She said the Middle East was considered a region of great promise in the 1950s and '60s, but secular governments abused the people they ruled over. Her second point was that radical Islamists are gaining power in part because religious rulers are seen as being more honest.

"How will people reconcile democracy with the idea that religion is the only way to have a just government?" she asked. The answer, she said, is hard to predict. To illustrate her third, point, Stanton, showed a postcard of Mecca, the most holy city in postcard showed a small town buildings.

The next picture showed Mecca today, with huge build-around it. One of the tenants of Islam is that Muslims should ran," said Sheryl Brenn, "that if make a pilgrimage, or Haj, to Mecca, which includes visiting the Kabba, at least once in their lifetimes.

Where once 2,000 to 10,000 pilgrims visited the city each Kansas, said she met a man with year, now there are about 2.5 million, she said. Since Mecca is in a desert in Saudi Arabia, it used to be difficult to get there alive. Now so many people are coming that the Saudi government rations visas allowing them in. "It used to be difficult to get to Mecca," Stanton said. "Now it's difficult to get into Mecca."

She thinks that the Muslim religion will change, showing more emphasis on the other four tenents: a declaration of faith, charity, praying to Mecca each day, and fasting during the day on the holy month of Ramadan, and less emphasis on the Haj.

"They're seen as arrogant," Stanton said of Saudis.

Her last point was that Muslim women, particularly in the U.S., are trying to have Muslim men and women praying together. She said these women have looked through the Quran, the Muslim Holy book, and found nothing that said that men and women must pray separately, or that men should lead prayers.

The fact that most Muslims living here are immigrants Islam, in the early 1900s. The means Muslims from different countries are interacting with with the Kabba, a sacred Muslim each other and with American shrine, hardly noticed among the converts to the religion, she noted.

Stanton said that different verses of the Quran can be interpreted different ways, and that some extremists also kill people they see as "bad Muslims."

Mustaphar Darboe, a Muslim college student from the country of Gambia in west Africa, said that the Quran does in fact state that men should lead prayers, and that people killing non-Muslims are doing so for their own personal gain.

Darboe was speaking with several other students.

"If she's not a Muslim, I don't think she can be a professor in Islamic Studies," Talha Mahmood, a student from Pakistan, said.

Darboe did not like Brenn's story about killing non-Muslims either.

"I don't think that statement was correct," he said, "How many people in the audience will think that Muslims are bad."

Afterward, Brenn said she appreciated Stanton's lecture and learned a lot, but that she had heard a number of disturbing reports in the news about Muslim extremists.

As for her story, she said the man she heard it from was opened, several people asked from a Muslim country in South
