Weather College board hears from two dining services college would be $90,000, including a 12 percent commission back to the college. With this investment, Eusebio said, the company would provide the college with an access system, a replacement soft-serve ice cream machine and a snack bar.

Also, Chartwells would increase catering funds for the school. The presidential fund would increase from $1,200 to $10,000 and the student fund, for student groups, etc., would go from zero to $2,500. Unused money at the end of the year would not be returned.

Eusebio said another important item for Colby is accounts receivable, and he said they understand that. College attorney John Gatz had asked for language about charging interest to be removed from the contract, but Eusebio said it legally cannot be taken out.

"Everyone (at the company) is in agreement that our past practices with regards to receivables," Eusebio said, "should be an indicator to the college how our future efforts of collections will be."

Billie Jennings, vice president of sales and marketing for Great Western, presented after Eusebio answered questions from the trustees.

She started with the facts of Great Western, a small company with a flat organizational structure that began in 1990 and is based in Tipton, Mo.

Jennings said they are dedicated to making dining on the college's campus the best it can be and try to put the needs of the customers and clients first.

"Our goal is to always say 'yes' to the customer," she said.

She said they have a menu cycle that they start out with, but try to incorporate campus favorites as they learn the campus.

Jennings said Great Western provides personalized service, excellent catering and they try to save the college money wherever possible.

She added that they have great food at a great value and a personalized approach, which includes having the food service director always on the floor, especially during meal times to talk the students and customers.

"If there's any issues, that's how they find out," Jennings said.

Another key benefit, she said, is that the district manager will visit campus often and are asked to stay through four meal periods.

Also, Jennings said they bring marketing and communication and design and development expertise.

She said they have a reciprocal service, meaning students can receive food from any other school that uses Great Western.

"We think the next step would be doing the transition," Jennings said, "and we think it'd be a win-win for Colby and Great Western."

The trustees asked Jennings questions after her presentation as well and then discussed what they were feeling after hearing both presentations.

Vacik said he still felt the same about who to go with. Chairman Arlen Leiker asked about the difference in pricing between the two and Dr. Keegan Nichols, vice president of student affairs and marketing, said the prices were comparable with just a 9-cent difference for the 18-meal plan.

Trustee Bill Shields said he was more confused about what to do than before because Chartwells came more prepared than Great Western, maybe to try and retain the account, he said. Trustee Nick Wells agreed, bringing up the fact that Chartwells moved their prices down $19,400.

Leiker said he was worried about being locked into one of these deals, which are both for five years, and wondered if there would be a way for them to get out.

Also, as mentioned in previous meetings, if the college changes to Great Western right now, it would have to buy out the Chartwells contract which would cost $42,000.

Gatz said he thinks both of the contracts are ambiguous and problematic. He said he would want to change them, whichever company the board picks.

After some more discussion about what each company would offer, Shields made a motion to explore further with Great Western and iron out the details, but make sure the college would be able to do it from a financial standpoint.

Once again, there was a tie vote, 3-3, with trustees Kenton Krehbiel, Leiker and Shields voting for the motion and trustees Dale Herschberger, Cindy Black and Wells voting against.

The board decided to find the current contract the college has with Chartwells to find out when it expires.

Nichols said the contract is up on June 30, 2013, but after a couple of previous agreement extensions, the college is paying them until 2015.

With support from Vacik, Shields made a new motion: Due to financial obligations and past relationships with the Chartwells organization, the college would continue its relationship with Chartwells through June 30, 2014.

In other business, the board approved modifying a resolution for bank signatory cards.

Senators seek deal on gun-sale checks friend at a shooting range," Schumer said last week in one of the senators' few public remarks about the package the group is seeking.

Polls show that requiring background checks for nearly all gun purchases has more public support than Obama's proposals to ban assault weapons and high-capacity ammunition magazines, and it is among those given the best chance of enactment. Even so, it is opposed by the NRA and many congressional Republicans, who consider it intrusive independents. and unworkable for a system they say already has flaws.

"My problem with background checks is you're never going to get criminals to go through background checks," Wayne LaPierre, NRA executive vice president, told the Senate Judiciary Committee at its gun control hearing last week.

help overcome that opposition by opening the door to support from other conservative Republicans besides Coburn. It also could make it easier to win backing from Democratic senators from GOPleaning states, many of whom face re-election next year and who have been leery of embracing Obama's proposals.

Schumer and Kirk each have "F" scores from criminal records. the NRA, while Coburn and Manchin have "A" ratings.

Prompted by the December massacre of 20 first-graders and six adults in Newtown, Conn., the Democratic-led Judiciary Committee plans to write gun control legislation in the next few weeks. The committee's chairman, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has expressed strong support for universal background checks and it is expected to be a cornerstone of his bill, but a version of that language with bipartisan support could give the entire package a boost.

"If the language is meaningful, it would be obviously a huge step," said Josh Horwitz, executive director of the Coalition to Stop Gun Violence, which represents child welfare, religious and other groups favoring gun curbs. "To have someone like Coburn, who's voted consistently with the gun lobby, to come out and endorse a meaningful background check would be very helpful."

It is likely that any gun-control bill will need 60 votes to pass the 100-member Senate. Democrats have 55 votes, including two Democratic-leaning

Leaders of the GOP-run House are planning to see what, if anything, the Senate passes before moving on gun legislation.

Strategists believe that a measure that passes the Senate with clear bipartisan support could pressure the House to act.

Federal data on gun purchases is gathered by the An agreement among the four senators could National Instant Criminal Background Check System, which is run by the FBI.

> According to Justice Department estimates, the federal and state governments ran 108 million background checks of firearms sales between 1994 when the requirement became law and 2009. Of those, 1.9 million – almost 2 percent – were denied, usually because would-be purchasers had

> People legally judged to be "mentally defective" are among those blocked by federal law from firearms purchases. States are supposed to make mental health records available to the federal background check system and receive more generous Justice Department grants if they do, but many provide little or no such data because of privacy concerns or antiquated record-keeping systems.

Coburn got involved in the background check talks about two weeks ago and says a compromise could make it harder for dangerous people to acquire firearms.
