Teleconference for farmers and ranchers will focus on how to sell in local markets

The Kansas Rural Center invites beginning farmers and ranchers searching for information on pricing and selling in local food markets to join a teleconference call at 7 p.m. Thursday. The call will be moderated by Julie Mettenburg, executive director of the center, who brings experience in marketing grass-finished beef and other meats from her family's operation in Franklin County. Also joining the call will be producers with experience in fruits and vegetables, and value-added products. They will be available to share information, resources and ideas.

The questions and comments participants bring to the call. Participants on the call will be invited to share their experiences and challenges around pricing and marketing their products, to gain feedback and help identify what resources may be needed in Kansas.

The center is conducting a year-long study of the challenges that are reported by beginning farmers, with a goal of identifying resource needs. It is also providing education on top challenges as identified through the study, including access to capital, equipment and land; pricing and marketing; and organic certification, among others. Funding for this research and education project is provided by Farm Aid. The call is toll free and can be accessed on a home or cell phone. To participate, go to www.kansasruralcenter.org to sign up and receive the call number or contact Natalie Fullerton at nfullerton@kansasruralcenter.org, or (402) 310-0177.
