Doctor pays call

SAM DIETER/Colby Free Press
Dr. LaDonna Regier and Maria Oard posed during a reception Oct. 20 at Trinity Lutheran Church. Regier is home from her mission work in Ghana with a broken knee, and Oard plans to start her own mission work there. They showed pictures of children and pigs picking through landfills in Ghana and had copies of a book for sale by a preacher who lives there. They are working to raise money to buy the land for a school.

Fort Hays grows; tuition stable

Hays at the same time has gone up by 21.5 percent, while some Kansas universities have actually seen a drop in new in-state students.

"Students that were going there are now going here," he said, pointing to Fort Hays, adding that his school is seeing record numbers of students from Shawnee and Sedgwick counties.

He said a decision he made in 2000 not to raise tuition is attracting students to Fort Hays. The cost of tuition, student fees and room and board at Fort Hays, he said, is $30,000 to $40,000 a year less than at KU over four years. The higher tuition charged at some schools, he said, comes with a belief that paying more for something makes it better.

"I have more faith in Kansans than that," Hammond added.

Out of around 13,000 students at Fort Hays, he said about 5,000 go to school there and 5,000 are online students. Around 3,300 attend the university's program in China.

Hammond said the the university makes about $4 million a year from having the program in that country, some of which he uses to subsidize education for Kansas students. He added that he expects the university to have 21,000 students by 2015.

He pointed out that a full 95 percent of Fort Hays graduates either have a job or plan to go to another school within six months of graduating.

A big factor in the job market these days, he added, is the wider number of jobs that require workers to be educated. Students need to be re-educated several times over in their lives, creating the need to educate adults who cannot move to another town because they already have families and homes. These students could take online classes, he said. It would not require them to pack up their lives to find a new school.

Fresh firewood

SAM DIETER/Colby Free Press

This pile of firewood was about all that was left by about 4 p.m. Friday of a tree that fell onto a shed. The healthy-looking tree had been trimmed on one side according to Janene Woodall, who rents the property where it stood. Several of those who worked to cut it up said the roots appeared to have rotted away.
