

Mayor rappels down skyscraper for charity

PHILADELPHIA (AP) – The mayor of Philadelphia has gone to extreme lengths to support a program for local youths. Mayor Michael Nutter rappelled down a 31-story building earlier this month to raise money for Outward Bound. Nutter and state Sen. Vincent Hughes were among dozens of participants who used ropes to descend the facade of the downtown skyscraper. Each agreed to raise $2,000 for Outward Bound. The national organization offers adventure-based education to students. Nutter said people working in the building “definitely did not expect to see some guy in their window.” The mayor rappelled down a 21-story building last year for the same cause. Philadelphia school officials recently used the program to bring together teens from rival high schools.

Health coverage information on Kansas department website

In an effort to help Kansans who are struggling to find health insurance coverage information on the federal marketplace website, the Kansas Insurance Department’s www.insureKS.org website has new features about Kansas plans, prices and assistance. “Kansans going to the site can now get a close estimate on what plans, tax credits and rates they can qualify for on the federal marketplace,” said Sandy Praeger, Commissioner of Insurance, “and they don’t have to log on to the government site or type in any identifiable information.” In addition to showing health plans and prices available in any Kansas county, the InsureKS.org site has a feature allowing users to locate marketplace-certified agents and non-profit organization navigators throughout the state.

“We hope the new features will give consumers a head start on the enrollment process once they can get through on the healthcare.gov site,” Commissioner Praeger said. Kansas is one of 36 states that has a federally-operated marketplace. The marketplace began October 1, but computer problems have prevented most people from completing the enrollment process through the federal site.

The new department website went live on Sept. 1. The information there is distinct from the department’s regular website, www.ksinsurance.org. Consumers can also stay up-to-date with health insurance information at www.facebook.com/insureks or by following InsureKS on Twitter.
