Woody plants' seeds do not germinate quickly

The majority of woody plants produce seed that will not germinate immediately after harvest.

Normally this is due to one of three reasons: the seed is immature and simply needs more time to develop; there is a mechanical barrier keeping water from reaching the seed; or there is a physiological block that inhibits germination.

Immature seed needs time to complete development and does not require special treatment. The water barrier and/or physiological block requires special treatments to prepare the seed for germination.

One such treatment is stratification. Stratification is a process whereby seed is given the moisture and temperature conditions normally found in it's natural environment. Seeds that are shed in early fall often require a warm moist stratification period before the seed will germinate.

Those that drop later in the fall may respond to cool, moist conditions. In Kansas, the most common stratification needed is the cool, moist type.

The amount of time required for there is too little moisture, the seed coat does not take up the water needed.

Too much reduces the amount of oxygen available to the seed.

If peat moss is used, a ratio of 1 or 1 1/4 parts water to 1 part air-dried peat moss by weight is recommended. When wetting peat moss, use warm water, which is absorbed more quickly than cold.

Small amounts of seed can be stratified by placing the seed in moist peat moss inside a plastic bag and placing the bag in the refrigerator. Small seeds can be placed between two sheets of cheesecloth so they are not lost in the medium.

Larger amounts of seed can be placed in a plastic container or wooden box. Place layers of seed between layers of moist sand or a mixture of sand and peat moss.

Bury the container outside, so the top is even with the surface of the soil, and cover with leaves or straw. Alternatively, the container may be placed in an unheated garage or root cellar.
