Day of district recognition set for May 3

By BEVERLY KINDLER

The Norton County Family and Community Education Units are hosting the District Recognition Day on Monday, May 3. Unit members from Gove, Decatur and Sheridan counties will participate.

Activities start with a coffee hour at 9 a.m. at the 4-H Building in Norton. The program will follow with Ruth Lofgreen presiding.

Music will be provided by Ashton Lofgreen and Kollean McMullen.

Linda Gleason, St. John, will present the program feature, "Toys We Grew Up With", with information about the history of some of the most popular toys of the past century.

During the past 100 years, a variety of toys have been on children's wish lists. Some have come about because of times of economic crisis or war; some because of new technologies and some purely by accident.

Some that were popular at the turn of the century have stood the test of time and still delight children three and four generations later.

Music can brighten a room

To borrow a phrase from my old friend, Doris Ballard, 'One of Ours' came home to Norton last week and brought a lot of wonderful musical memories with her.

Neva Rae McCreary Shoof with her "My Friends and I" group gave us an Arts Council presentation that was a real treat.

The songs this small ensemble used in their tribute to melody in our lives brought to mind the joys of sheet music.

Here's yet another collection that doesn't require much dusting and, right now, is still very affordable to the average collector. In the years when radios and record players were rarities in the ordinary home, many homes had a piano and a bench full of sheet music.

Are you fortunate enough to have some old sheet music? Hang onto it and keep an eye out for it at auctions and shops, for this is a collectible that can provide enjoyment in myriad ways.

Lots of the art work on sheet music from the 1920s featured classic Art Deco designs and sketches, some comedic, some romantic. Later on, photographs of the singer that introduced the song or made it famous were shown on the frontispiece, often with a signature.

A clever wall arrangement of music under glass in narrow black frames looks great in any room, but is particularly apropos in a music room or to perk up a dull hallway.

Even tattered and torn remnants can be salvaged and used in decoupage projects or as a wallpaper accent. Some collections are kept in clear page protectors in a notebook so they can be safely admired but can also be slipped out and played when there's one you just can't resist hearing once again.

In gentler days every family that could possibly squeeze out the money saw to it that their children were given piano lessons. The piano might have been an old upright with chipped and yellowing keys plus the one that didn't play quite right, but music still was made on it.

Many a maiden lady or widow made a good living giving piano lessons after school. Some of those lessons were paid for with eggs or dress making or other barter, but the music went on. A pleasant interlude after dinner in the evening was hearing each child perform his or her "piece". And when that required number was accomplished, out came the popular sheet music of the day for some recreation.

Sheet music was sold, usually at a music store if your town had one, or at the drug store or dime store. It often sold for pennies.

An after school soda session wasn't complete without a raffle through the new scores. Often a music store would have a piano available for customers to try out a new melody before purchase. Clever managers knew that in addition to selling the product, it encouraged local musicians to perform publicly which brought in passing customers to listen and perhaps buy.

After all, in larger cities, managers had to pay pianists to promote a new melody and bring in business.

Lots of old music turns up at auctions and the values are rising a bit. Clean out that old piano bench and bring back some memories. Old songs are priceless to those who remember them and those nostalgic melodies, while perhaps out of current vogue, keep coming back again and again.

Remember "Margie" and "Humoresque" and "When the Moon Comes Over the Mountain"? And who could forget such classics as "Maryzie Doats" and "Piano Roll Blues"?

Today with boom boxes and compact disc players everywhere, not to mention piped-in sound systems, there is no lack of music. What is lacking is our choice not only of selection but of volume. I say bring back that old piano, a box of sheet music and a family of budding pianists.

FROM THE COOK: Asparagus season is here, oh happy day. Drizzle with olive oil and grill for four minutes over charcoal. No better treat this side of paradise.

About that 'warmed over flavor' in meat

Have you ever cooked a roast, refrigerated it, and then re-heated it to find the stored meat tastes like your refrigerator?

This is a common problem called "warmed-over flavor," and is recognized as a primary quality defect in refrigerated cooked and pre-cooked frozen meat products. In sensory panels, it is commonly described as "stale," "cardboard-like," "painty" or "rancid."

The primary cause of this warmed-over flavor is lipid oxidation. In particular, polyunsaturated fatty acids tend to oxidize more than saturated fatty acids. Oxidation can develop with heat, light or enzymes. Once oxidation begins, it grows rapidly.

According to research, salt tends to accelerate oxidation in pork patties. Other research shows that metals from water, equipment or spices can encourage oxidation.

Light can provide energy to increase oxidation. This becomes a problem in meat display cases.

When meats are ground, chopped, mixed and tumbled, oxygen is introduced, which also increases oxidation. Whole muscle meats are less susceptible.

Meat processors can add antioxidants, use oxygen-free packaging and use specific cooking processes to reduce the onset of warmed-over flavor.

Can this problem be prevented at home? Unfortunately, this is more or less impossible.

Some consumers are more sensitive to warmed-over flavor. Adding a marinade, gravy or sauce can help mask the taste. Otherwise, eating the meat after the first cooking is the only alternative.
