Foodie faces make mealtime fun

Making foodie faces with your children can be amusing, educational and nutritious for all of you.

We started doing face lunches almost by accident one day when I found the sandwich bread had mysteriously turned moldy overnight. With no car available for a quick trip to the market and two hungry kids wanting some lunch I was forced to fall back and punt. While putting the sandwich makin's out on a couple of salad plates, inspiration hit and foodie faces were born.

Using two halves of hardboiled eggs for eyes and half a slice of bologna for a smiling mouth below them I pieced out the rest of the features with a pickle slice nose and some green pepper strips for ears. The children were delighted and munched down every bite, giggling as they bit "teeth" into the smile and chewed up the "piggle" nose. From that emergency beginning we came up with a lot of creative variations for a weekly treat. Sometimes the children chose, sometimes I surprised them but they asked every day if it was face day again. Wisely kept for a special treat we didn't burn out the enthusiasm with over familiarity.

Are you running into lunchtime boredom with the same old sandwiches? Or perhaps despairing of getting your child to eat anything but chicken noodly soup? Maybe you'd like to introduce some different fruits, vegetables, or meats into your child's diet without a hassle. Foodies are for you!

Here are just a few of the neat ideas we used. Cheese can be cut and adapted for use as almost any feature, as can diminutive sandwiches or leftover meats. Eggs are not the only eye materials. Try large round dill slices or tomato slices in the summer or any other round veggie. A black olive slice laid on each "eye" can effectively provide goofy facial expressions. Half of many things can form a mouth — cheese slices or curved bread slices spread with peanut butter or raspberry jam. How about a curvy banana? Right side up for a smiley on a happy day;

Cook's Corner Liza Deines

Upside down for a sulky face. Ears and hair are fun ways to introduce raw broccoli or cauliflowererets, pepper strips, carrol curls or radish slices, and Chinese noodles make a great hairdo. Snazzy earrings may be added using with olives, too, or a couple of grapes, grape tomatoes or even tiny squares of cooked beets or carrot circles. Noses are the very best. Try grapes here, too, sliced or whole, or a whole red radish, a little carrot point, and once in a blue moon, a tiny Milky Way or Snickers bar. Of course there was a bargain on candy noses — if you chose to nibble that down first, you had to eat every bit of the rest of the face, no matter what it was. No problems ever came up over this since most faces were devoured in their entirety without a whimper.

Many new miniature products are on the market now which could be utilized in face sculptures. Think small cheese and crackers or those little bitty sandwich cookies, or character crackers.

Hot dog slices work in a lot of places. Zig zag teeth will make almost any face into a jack o'lantern. Scarecrows, cats, puppy dog faces and angels are easy to do and try a Santa Claus face with a red pepper hat and a shredded coconut beard. Because there is a variety yet not a lot of any new food, children are not intimidated and will learn to eat a wide range of foods.

Tired of fighting that "I'm not hungry" battle? Make a face at (and for) your kid!

WORDS FROM ONE OLDER AND WISER: Yes, send your flowers to the living but also give them your words of loving appreciation while you still can. A letter received here last week did me more good than all the meds, IV's, and surgery of the last months. Made me cry, too, but happy tears.
