Peanuts can have many uses

Many of us enjoy snacking on peanuts or a simple peanut butter sandwich. But peanuts are also used in other foods such as sauces, ice cream, ethnic dishes, baked goods, salads, and more. It is a nutrient-dense food that adds a nutritional boost to many foods.

Peanuts are technically legumes, but most consumers see them as nuts. They are the most commonly consumed nut in the United States with 600 million pounds eaten each year. Add in peanut butter consumption and peanuts make up two-thirds of the nut consumption each year. Half of the top 10 candy bars have peanuts or peanut butter as an ingredient.

Peanuts are versatile. Besides peanut butter, peanuts are used as flour, oil, puree, sauce, and Peanuts also contain resveratrol, the same phytochemical found in red wine and grape skins. Resveratrol can protect against cardiovascular and neurodegenerative diseases, inflammation, and cancer. The resveratrol content varies by type of peanut and processing method. Peanut skins also contain resveratrol.

boiled. So chefs are looking for ways to incorporate peanuts into recipes.

Nutritionally, peanuts research is looking at peanuts to reduce heart disease, cancer, type 2 diabetes, and hypertension. Peanuts can also help with weight loss because they increase satiety and contain poly- and monounsaturated fats. They also add protein, fiber, folate, and many other important nutrients.

So, don't be surprised to see more peanuts being used in foods and recipes. Just think...peanuts could show up in macaroni and cheese!

A childhood memory of Halloween

"There's some mail for you on the dining room table," Mama called as I came puffing in from school. I'm only nine and I don't get much mail, so I drop everything and run to see. The envelope is orange and is addressed with fancy, grown-up handwriting with swirls. Almost too pretty to open, but even nicer inside. "Christine is having a Halloween party and I'm invited," I squeal with delight. "Costumes and everything and a haunted house and a movie in their rumpus room!"

"A costume by Saturday night," Mama says thoughtfully. "We'll have to get busy, won't we?"

Can I wear my war bonnet? I beg. "And my leather vest?" "What a good idea," Mama says. "Isn't it fortunate your brother gave you such a timely gift?"

See, my big brother Roger is going to college now and has a job at a service station, too, pumping gas and polishing windshields. The first weekend he came home he brought me a wonderful feathered Indian headdress just like the one on the Big Chief tablets. He said with my big fat braids, I could be Pocahontas. I'm not so sure girl Indians are chiefs but I'm not giving up those feathers for anything. He also brought me a calf hide vest that was all tooled and decorated with nail heads and stars and shiny red reflectors. It has fringe just like the clothes Dale Evans wears in the movies and my name is burned into the leather like a cattle brand. Oh, it is the best, best thing I've ever had to wear in my whole life. And come Saturday I am all rigged out in the vest over a red and white checked shirt, braids tied with leather thongs, my feathers all in place. Mama helped me paint my face with rouge and lipstick and I've been practicing war whoops all afternoon. Daddy is more than ready to have me out of the house

Child of the 40s Liza Deines

so he walks me the four blocks to Christine's house.

Or is this Christine's house? Gauze cobwebs festoon the front porch, a huge cardboard black cat cutout is stuck to the front door. Jack o-lanterns glowing with candles are perched on the porch rail and spooky music is playing even outside the house. A fairy princess (Chris) leads us through a spooky tunnel of sheets to the stairs in the kitchen where Lynn, Christine's brother wrapped as a mummy, blindfolds each guest and escorts us down to what used to be a laundry room, but is now the official Chamber of Horrors. We have to take poison (unsweetened cocoa powder), eat worms (cold, wet spaghetti) and eyeballs (peeled grapes) and thrust our hands into the entrails of a corpse, which feels suspiciously like a washtub full of wet mops and sponges and then we must "lick the quivering liver."

Tastes a lot like raspberry jell-o to me! We all shriek and scream and quake appropriately, then gather to watch and giggle as the next victim is ushered downstairs. Christine's dad has a projector and pull-down screen and he rented some reels from the movie theatre man. So we get to see cartoons and a Laurel and Hardy film and even a Rocky Alan Lane western. Christine's sister supervises games and bobbing for apples, serves hot dogs, cider, cupcakes. Sharon Ann wins the costume contest in her witch robes, tall hat and broom. She carries a fuzzy, battery powered black cat that yowls and flashes its eyes. Her grandma runs the toy shop downtown so she always has really neat stuff.

All too soon fathers start appearing to pick us up and take us home. Even though I am a big girl and I know there are no ghosts or goblins I am sure glad Dad is walking me home through the spooky darkness. "Did you have fun," Dad asks as we scuff along through fallen locust pods and dry leaves. I squeeze his big warm hand and say, "Oh, Daddy, you just can't even imagine how GOOD!" And we laugh together and turn toward the warm golden lights of home.

A NOTE FROM LIZA: Call it Devil's Night if you must, but to me, it will always be All Saints Day.
