HANSEN MUSEUM

The Dane G. Hansen Memorial Museum presents Perfecting the Past: Colonial Revival Quilts. This exhibition created by the International Quilt Study Center and Museum, of the University of Nebraska-Lincoln will be on display Oct. 11 to Dec. 1, 2013.

The Colonial Revival was a cultural movement that portrayed the colonial era as a simple and noble time. Strongest in the late-nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Colonial Revival romanticized colonial life and idealized the domestic sphere. It is no surprise, then, that the Colonial Revival sparked renewed interest in making needlework items that had been popular in previous generations such as cross-stitch samplers, hooked rugs and quilts. Textiles traditionally have been closely connected to women's lives, and quilting, in particular, allowed women to believe they were participating in a needle art practiced by their colonial grandmothers. By making quilts like those their foremothers supposedly had made (even though quilt making was a fairly rare activity in colonial days performed mainly by the wealthy and rarely incorporating patchwork or appliqué), women felt that they were participating not only in tradition, but in history itself.

They incorporate elements of the complexity of the movement itself. They may be pieced, repeating block-style quilts or appliqué quilts, and they may be hand and/or machine sewn.

They demonstrate how quilt-makers often used historic design source along with modern techniques to create quilts that are a unique blend of romance and reality.
